Abstract How do we make education precincts within cities work for the economic and social development of their whole regions, and what are the best 'hosting' practices for governments, business and community partners to do that? David will explore how education clusters can generate wider income and employment, how they can be sustainable in triple bottom line terms and how they can creatively and productively engage with their communities. David will lead a discussion on prospects for two key areas within Sydney.

David Wilmoth, Director of Learning Cities International, is active in starting new universities and other education institutions and in advising on urban growth management in countries around the world. David was Deputy Vice Chancellor of RMIT, Chair of Melbourne's Knowledge Precinct, Commonwealth reviewer of the Multifunction Polis, framer of Botswana's education hub policy, and founding CEO of RMIT Vietnam, RMIT Malaysia and a number of other university branch campus developments and education companies.

Learning Cities International and Conybeare Morrison International co-operate in the development of education precincts and university campuses.
